

Subcontracting: Both Sides of the Same Coin

By Jill Odom

Anyone who has been in the green industry for any time at all can tell you that there is a plethora of specialties your business can go into, but if you're wanting to add extra services without having to learn a new skill set, this is where subcontractors come in.

By definition, a subcontractor is a business or a person who carries out work for a company as part of a larger project. They may be more expensive than regular employees at times, but their expertise is well worth the price.

Subcontractors are often hired as experts in their fields, and are generally more knowledgeable about their work than a jack-of-all-trades. They can also be used to free up a landscaping company's regular staff.

"They help us when we have a lot of work during the peak season," said Enzo Parilli, owner of TurfCreek, based in Loganville, Georgia. "When we have too many jobs, we use the subcontractors to fulfill demand and help us still create revenue and meet our customers' needs."

When subcontractors are used, landscapers can avoid all the costs associated with hiring and training typical employees as well as the need to outfit them with uniforms or vehicles to get them to the jobsite. Another benefit of hiring a subcontractor is it frees your company up from buying and maintaining specialized equipment.

"Anything good that a subcontractor does on a job on your behalf has positive ramifications for your reputation with your customer," said Ken Thompson, director of quality and efficiency for the landscape construction division of Ruppert Landscape. "In many cases, the owner or general contractor sees the subcontractor as you. So good (or bad) work or interactions with your sub can help to enhance your reputation with your customer as competent, skilled, and responsive."

Working with a Subcontractor

The tricky thing about starting a relationship with a subcontractor is first finding one, as most landscaping companies hire one that they already know. If you're just getting started, this is more of a challenge because you know less about who is in the industry. You can reach out to associations like the American Subcontractors Association or suppliers and ask who they would recommend. Over time, as you build up your network, you'll soon know former co-workers and people from other
